Brand New Book  Print on Demand .This work first appeared as a set of articles published in the United Service Journal, starting in March 1831. They were written by an officer who served initially in the 1st, Royal Dragoons before joining the hussars in 1812. They were written to counteract a common opinion at the time that the British cavalry had not conducted themselves well during the Napoleonic wars. Certainly the story of the British cavalry is a mixture of unbelievable brilliance and bravery, tempered by frequent rashness and incompetent handling. One example was the charge of the 13th Light Dragoons at Campo Mayor on 25th March 1811. Two squadrons charged and routed two regiments of French cavalry and then chased them several miles to the gates of the French held fortress of Badajoz. The charge was brilliant and brave, the pursuit was reckless. This sequence was not unusual, other examples being at Vimiero, Talavera and Maguilla. There were however some notable successes, such as at Benavente, Sahagun, Usagre and Salamanca. For most of the Peninsular war, the British cavalry was so weak that they could never face their opponents in an open field. This was possibly just as well. Wellington's view was that man for man, a British trooper was better than a French trooper, but as the numbers rose they became less easy to control. This does seem to fit with the successes which the British cavalry did have, which invariably involved small numbers. This inability to control larger groups was partially due to the lack of training received by the troopers themselves, but mainly due to the almost total lack of officers capable of manoeuvring larger bodies of cavalry. Few names stand out,...
